Market Outlook

In August, Indonesia continued its encouraging macroeconomic indicators. The first highlight of the month is BI rate cut amounting to 25bps, bringing the rate into 5%. The cut, which was outside of the consensus view, was additionally encouraging as the governor maintained a dovish stance, looking for additional rooms to cut in a bid to support national economic growth. Further BI rate cut may also increase in possibility if the Fed does cut rate in September as per market expectations. Trying to address weak purchasing power, the government is also expected to rollout digital subsidies (bansos digital) in September 2025, with initial trial in Banyuwangi, East Java. If successful, the program will be implemented nationally in January 2026. Unlike previous traditional subsidies, the program will utilise Payment ID to ensure recipients can only buy important commodities such as rice through the application barcode. The digitalisation will also create better verification process by ensuring more accurate targeting, with potential recipients needing to confirm their identity via digital national ID or through field agents. We think a successful rollout will be very beneficial, given the common issues of traditional subsidies, including diversion of the fund into online gambling or disbursement into inappropriate recipients, will be partially resolved. We note however the main issue for the program is the requirement to have a bank account, as Indonesian population is generally underpenetrated by the banking system. Although August was closed with national protest borne from the tragic incident involving Affan Kurniawan, an online ride-hailing driver, we maintain that economic fundamentals of the country remain unaffected. Given the range of positive sentiments such as the BI rate cut and pro-growth stance, once socio-political conditions stabilise, we think the equity market will be in a position for a year-end rally.
